* * *

"A university such as this embodies all the complexities of contemporary society. What goes on in its laboratories and classrooms reaches out and influences all aspects of community life, and is in turn influenced by them. The State of New Jersey itself is a microcosm, containing all the problems with which education, research and creative scholarship must attempt to deal: problems of conserving natural resources . . . ; problems of development . . . in agriculture and industry; problems of urban and rural living; and the crucial problems of human values and human relations which have both practical and philosophical aspects."

Address of Dr. Lewis Webster Jones upon his inauguration as 15th president of Rutgers University, The State University of New Jersey, on Thursday, May 8, 1952.
